

Caleb Henry

Born and raised in St. Louis, Missouri, Caleb began his musical journey through his public school's strings program in fourth grade, an experience that sparked both his passion for music and his interest in teaching. He quickly became deeply involved in a wide range of ensembles and musical activities while studying with Laura Reycraft, developing a strong foundation in both musicianship and discipline.

Caleb earned his Bachelor of Music degree from the DePaul University School of Music in 2019, studying with Rami Solomonow, Wei-ting Kuo, and Christine Due, and completed his Master of Music degree at the Peabody Institute of Johns Hopkins University in 2021, where he studied with Victoria Chiang.

After completing his formal training, Caleb spent several years teaching private lessons in Chapel Hill, North Carolina, working closely with students of diverse ages and skill levels. Now based in Philadelphia, Caleb is excited to support new students in their musical growth and to contribute to the city's thriving music community.

Caleb's teaching philosophy is centered on helping students build a strong musical foundation while developing confidence, curiosity, and a genuine love for music. He tailors his approach to each student's goals, learning style, and pace, combining solid technical instruction with creativity and musical expression. Whether working with beginners or more advanced players, he focuses on clear fundamentals, thoughtful practice habits, and making lessons engaging and motivating so students not only improve, but enjoy the process of learning and making music.
